

Healthcare Reform Will Help Louisiana's Small Businesses

Without change, health insurance premiums will continue to skyrocket.

Louisiana's small businesses and self-employed entrepreneurs spent $1.7 billion in healthcare premiums in 2008. According to projections based on research by MIT economist Jonathan Gruber,¹ that number will rise to $4.1 billion by 2018 without relief from comprehensive reform.²

Small businesses in Louisiana are burdened by high premiums.

Small businesses in Louisiana support healthcare reform to relieve them from rising and unpredictable health insurance rates, according to results of a telephone survey conducted in May 2009 and sponsored by Small Business Majority.³ The survey of 200 small business owners found:

- Just 36% of Louisiana small business owners reported paying for health insurance for their employees. Of those, 62% say they're really struggling to do so.
- Of the 64% who don't provide insurance, 87% say they can't afford it.
- The number one concern for Louisiana's small business owners regarding healthcare reform is controlling costs, followed by providing coverage for everyone and assuring high-quality standard minimum benefits.

Louisiana has high insurance market consolidation.

- The top two insurers maintain 74% of the market share.⁴
- The average family premium in Louisiana is $11,028 per year.
- Insurance rates are volatile for small businesses and vary substantially from year to year. The variance in premiums among businesses with 10 or fewer employees is so great that one might pay up to four times as much as another, similar firm of the same size.⁵

Louisiana's small businesses need reform to make healthcare affordable.

- A well-designed health insurance exchange would create a marketplace that is fair, efficient and predictable, relieving small business owners from the tedious and time-consuming task of shopping for health insurance in today's chaotic conditions.
- Insurance reform would ensure that thousands of Louisianans with histories of health problems would get coverage they've been denied.
- Tax credits and individual subsidies, included in the proposals now before Congress, would help businesses afford coverage for their employees.
- Long-term cost containment would reduce rates by eliminating waste and inefficiency.
